If I had any sense I'd delete it and start again, but I'm thinking, "My wife's dead, my daughter's in New Zealand, I'm in bad health, and I'm past caring, and who's paying any attention? And in ...

'A Partisan's Daughter,' by Louis de Bernières - The New ...

"Louis de Bernières delights in taking peripheral episodes of European history and viewing them on a human scale, moulding political events to the shape of ordinary lives.... Like Ian McEwan's On Chesil Beach, A Partisan's Daughter is a retrospective lament for all that could have been, had one moment in the past turned out differently.... It is also a story about the power of storytelling."

A Partisan's Daughter, by Louis de Bernières. It's getting on for ten years since I bought this book and I really can't explain why it's taken me so long to get round to reading it. I love De Bernières' books, which (like everyone else) I discovered when Captain Corelli's Mandolin became a bestseller, and then went on to read everything else that he'd written.

A Partisan's Daughter, by Louis de Bernières | ANZ ...

I was supremely impressed with Louis de Bernières' writing in Corelli's Mandolin and Birds Without Wings. I was left somewhat flat by A Partisan's Daughter. While the previous two books carried me away, thoroughly engaged my imagination, and taught me quite a bit about history, this book never seemed to go anywhere for me.
